Notes From The CABIN IN THE SKY

by Asa Gilmore

"...God is love" - 1 John 4:16

We live in exciting times. Then again, it may just be that living chronologically is always an exciting experience. Was there ever a boring time? I can't remember one, at least on the Comstock. Reno, perhaps.

Back to my point. Things move fast these days. Words, in particular, move fast, circling the world with the click of a mouse. Much is made of words spoken or spewed online, and a lot of it is forgotten in the tumult of the next 24 hour news cycle.

One of the things I love about assembling a weekly printed paper is the balance of intention and alacrity that we must bring to the craft. It has to be timely. We only have so many pages. It can't contain everything under the sun. And we get to think just long enough about it, because every week this gets printed on real paper and goes out to real people and gets filed in real brick and mortar Storey County offices as the official Paper of Record.

Maybe it's intention and permanence that is missing from online discourse. People call their friends and neighbors the worst things from behind a screen, confident that the algorithm will hide it the next day in a pile of new screeds and ads selling happiness one click at a time, manufactured in China.

I don't think that's all it is, but I do think it would help to add some weight to the process. Try it next time you're tempted to call someone out online. Imagine printing it out on paper and handing it to them in person. And then filing a copy with the county clerk...hello everyone in the Storey County Clerk's office, and thank you for reading.

There's still one ingredient that we need to add to online conversation, and every conversation. Throw out the measuring cup; you can't have too much of this part. It's love. Love for your fellow man. Love for life. Love for each breath you take.

People get wound pretty tight about the intertwined concepts of love and God and sometimes they fight wars over them. It's funny because there's so MUCH of both that nobody needs to worry about running out. But we walk around sometimes as if we've only got so much love in our pocket and we're saving it for the cat. If we give some to the people around us, we'll find that the well never runs dry, and that we end up grateful for the experience and start to feel that glow within us that is often described as spiritual transformation and faith.

I've always found the Comstock to be full of love. Some of the happiest days of my childhood were spent in Gold Hill. I have found deep friendships and brotherhood in Virginia City. It's a wonderful place to raise my family. But online, it's the same battle lines as anywhere else. If, like me, you're tired of watching people whose company you enjoy in real life be rude to each other on the internet, write me a letter about how great somebody is and I'll print it in the paper.

Love conquers all, and the sun is up over Devil's Gate. Time to go to print. May you ever walk in the sunlight of the spirit.

Welcome to IRL

PINE NUTS

by McAvoy Layne
The Ghost of Mark Twain

Being a stoved-up old Marine that does not text because his fingers are too fat, I had to look up the meaning of the acronym, "IRL." I was pleasantly surprised to learn IRL is text language for, "In Real Life." So I'd like to float IRL out there as an appellation for a third political party, "IRL," formerly, "DO NO HARM."

Digital space is deceiving. Back when we were mining gold and silver here in the Silver State, nobody had heard of dopamine, yet that's what they are mining today, and there's millions in it.

Buried deep in our brains is a powerful ball of neurons about the size of a blue jay's eyeball. It's called Nucleus Accumbens. (That word caused me to change my major in college from pre-med to auctioneering.) Anyway, that powerful little ball, when stimulated by something rewarding, releases a potent drug called dopamine. If dopamine had a voice it would shout, "Hey, do that again!" And that's just what the miners in digital corporate rooms want to hear. This is a reward system the digital world loves to mine, because Accumbens plus dopamine equals money, lots of it...

So it is that we have dopamine mining pits of pornography and bot-infused social media platforms, calling out to young minds swimming in digital dopamine. And what do they get? Addicted.

Granted, a handshake or a hug, or a smile might not stimulate a dollop of dopamine, but what a real-life person has to say might be worth its weight in, well, gold.

Too much Accumbens stimulation results in an underdeveloped prefrontal cortex, which shuts out the real world and leads to inappropriate behavior, including shouting offensive diatribes like, "Your mother wears combat boots!"

Once your oversensitive Accumbens calms down you might find yourself reading a good book, or taking a hike into an awe and wonder provoking nature...

So, yes, I'm thinking we might like to call our new third political party for 2026, "The IRL Party." What could be healthier than having a third party to unify our two major parties in making our country a safer place to raise our kids, while working across the aisle. What could be timelier than having a third political party to diminish the divisive rhetoric, toxic stress and political violence that imperils the trust that democracy needs to breathe.

We are presently seeking the right man or right woman to carry the banner and put their face on that banner. Two naturals that come to my mind are Pat Hickey and Kathryn Kelly. You too must have your personal favorites, and might want to shake their trees. Record a fitting name for a third party, and your personal pick to lead that party. And please send me a copy. Meanwhile I shall remain a friend trying to become a better person in a country trying to become a better democracy...

King's Corner

by Jeff Headley

We are re-printing this article as last week part of the article was accidentally cut off. We regret the error.

Halloween decorations are beginning to fill the stores, some classic and some strange. I saw one in Tractor Supplies of a cow draped in a sheet, supposed to look like a ghost. I half expected to see a "Battle Born" logo on the side of the sheet.

Every Halloween we're reminded that Nevada was born as a state in the midst of the civil war, a rushed anointing on October 31, 1864 so silver mining could provide the finances to fund The North. We're "battle born" although, fortunately, no battles of that time were fought on this soil.

But we've been impacted by frightening tragedies elsewhere.

For anyone old enough to remember, there was a party game you could always play and everyone would participate. Just ask "Where were you when you heard that President John F. Kennedy (JFK) had been shot?" Even now, every person that age clearly remembers. Each can share in great detail. The shock was seared onto their emotions. The party game was cathartic, the brief release of the still-embedded sense of loss.

On the night in April 1968 that the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated, Senator Robert F. Kennedy, then a candidate for president, told a shocked and largely Black crowd in Indianapolis that "it is perhaps well to ask what kind of a nation we are and what direction we want to move in."

"Those of you who are Black," he said, could be filled with "a desire for revenge." Or, he said, the nation could try to replace violence "with an effort to understand." It was considered one of the finest speeches of his life. But in the wake of Dr. King's death, riots, looting and arson erupted in more than 100 American cities, and Kennedy himself was assassinated that June in California.

Fifty-seven years later, our nation is at another polarized moment after the assassination of Charlie Kirk, the 31-year-old conservative activist gunned down on a college campus in Utah. We're grappling with the brutal killing of a young leader who is viewed through radically different lenses. On America's political right, Mr. Kirk has been lionized as an inspiration to a new generation of young conservatives. Among thousands of young conservatives on American college campuses he was a rock star, a gifted speaker who relished debating with more liberal students. On the left, he has been pilloried as a divider who attacked civil rights, transgender rights, feminism and Islam.

Both King and Kirk centered their ability to inspire passion in others based on their belief in the God and the Bible, and the certainty that it could impact everyday American life. Both murders both occurred in a country already awash in violent political rhetoric and partisan anger. Mentions of the term "civil war" have skyrocketed on social media platforms.

But the outcomes of then and now have the potential to be very different.

I think back to one time when my dad, Mark King, and I were at an event run by Douglas

What We Didn't See

County Mounted Sheriff's Posse, testing horses for use by the posse. In the first part both horse and rider had to traverse an obstacle course. In the next part the horse had to show it was capable of pulling loads, like it might be asked to do in a rescue situation. During each part Mark gave me a narrative of what they were doing and why.

Then the horses stood there as a helicopter landed. Mark said to watch them closely. I asked what I was looking for, and he said "nothing". I didn't understand. Then he explained that the horses should be doing nothing, not reacting in any way to the helicopter. What they didn't do was more important than what they did. That's what qualified them to be in the posse.

And that's what I've noticed in the last few days when Democrats and Republicans in Congress lashed out at each other, and are ever more fearful for their own safety. When strong opinions on both sides have filled social media. I watched what didn't happen.

How many buildings were burned? None. How many people were dragged into the street because they might look like the shooter? Not one. How many police officers were spit on for not doing their job? Not one. The hate, the negativity didn't erupt in violence. That alone offers hope.

If the assassin was seeking to trigger a violent response from MAGA they'd be disappointed. Instead they may have inspired a new generation of Charlie Kirks.

Charlie Kirk had principles, had accountability. That used to be something in this country to be admired: to be different, to speak your heart. He took risks, tackling topics that we almost can't discuss including three things that are death sentences for public speakers: religion, gender and politics.

And he had incredible patience. He would give the microphone to anyone, including those who strongly disagreed. He would give them the mic knowing they were ready to call him every name in the book.

Charlie, in his death, showed that his faith was incredibly strong. His willingness to create a public forum on college campuses to discuss anything was courageous. But what stands out to me is the willingness of both his supporters and opponents to move ahead without violence.

These coming weeks and this Halloween may not be filled with horrors, but with hope, because of what we didn't see.

Community Unites in Memory of Charlie Kirk

Chronicle Staff

*A memorial and candlelight vigil for Charlie Kirk at

The Comstock and Northern Lyon County community have been deeply touched by the recent politically motivated assassination of Charlie Kirk. On every street corner and in every church and coffee shop, conversation on the topic can be heard. On Saturday September 21st, a large group of people gathered at Kay Winters Park in Dayton for a memorial service. The well attended gathering, held the day before Kirk's official memorial in Arizona, was peaceful and full of prayer.

Kirk - a Christian activist, founder of Turning Point USA, husband, and father - was assassinated September 10 on a college campus in Utah. His death has been the catalyst for a national conversation on Christianity, forgiveness, freedom of speech, and political violence.

Separately from the public gathering, the Lyon Board of County Commissioners selected to name the Dayton Government Complex building the "Charles J. Kirk Government Complex." The building will be the future site of the Dayton Justice Court, District Attorney's Dayton Office, Human Services Dayton Office, and Sheriff's Office Dayton Substation. The building permit application for the facility has been submitted to the Community Development Department as well as Central Lyon County Fire Protection District. A date for the groundbreaking of the facility will be announced in the near future.

Gov. Joe Lombardo officially announced his re-election campaign on Sept. 15 in Las Vegas. Since then, he has been traveling throughout Nevada, including recent visits to rural areas such as Virginia City. This past Wednesday at the Delta Saloon, he received a warm reception from a diverse group of supporters and community members eager to engage with him about his vision for the future and his achievements thus far.

A significant portion of the governor's speech was dedicated to the accomplishments of his administration, including housing, education, economics, and his work with Tesla and Redwood Materials, which are based in Storey County. "Since we took office, we have created over ten thousand new jobs in our state, and I'm pleased to announce that thousands of those jobs will be in northern Nevada," Lombardo said.

Governor Lombardo speaks at Delta Saloon

Gary Schmidt, Wes Francis, Assembly Minority Leader PK O'Neill, Senator Settlemeyer, Sheriff Cullen and more with Gov. Lombardo

The governor praised his education and housing legislation that was passed in the recent legislative session. Lombardo did mention unemployment with this statement: "Our unemployment rate is unacceptable, and so is the high number of vacant jobs waiting for the right applicant."

Gov. Lombardo stated he ran for governor of Nevada because he saw the state going in the wrong direction, he wishes to continue growth in the right direction, and said, "Just wait and see what we can accomplish in eight years," to which he received a room full of chants of "let's go Joe." Lombardo reminds everyone how important it is to get out and vote. There are important issues at stake, and he wants the Rural communities to know they matter.

Misbeehaven Farm LLC

Would you knowingly take a job where your “employees” sting you, sometimes die on you, and take their sweet time making the product you depend on? For Aaron and Stacy Grimes of Misbeehaven Farm LLC, that’s daily life—and they wouldn’t have it any other way.

Nestled on the border of Lyon and Storey Counties—technically in Storey and holds the title of first beekeepers in the county—this hardworking husband-and-wife team has been building their beekeeping business for nearly a decade. For Aaron, beekeeping was not just a career change; it was a lifeline when he could no longer keep his career as a truck driver because of a medical condition.

“I told my wife, I didn’t want to sit on my butt and do nothing, watch TV, so I watched some YouTube videos and I thought, ah, beekeeping,” he explained.

His other idea was tarantula breeding; however, Stacy quickly drew the line at hairy arachnids.

“Well, we’re not having those spiders in the house,” she laughed. “But I’m scared to death of bees and they know because they can smell your fear pheromone. I call it my chicken pheromone!”

Aaron started with just four hives, fumbling his way through that first year, learning quickly that beekeeping is about much more than buying bees and hoping for honey. It takes a lot of skill and patience. Today, he manages just under 100 colonies, placing hives at their place in the Dayton, Carson Valley, Carson City, and as far as

Penn Valley, Calif. to give the bees access to diverse blooms throughout the year.

Beekeeping is far from easy. From moving hives and keeping bees alive to harvesting the honey and waiting months for infused flavors to develop, every jar on their table represents long hours of hard work. Most of the time the couple does everything themselves, by hand – working with a friend who has extraction equipment – but when they need extra help, their son and daughter will step in. And, throughout the process, the bees sometimes make it less-than-pleasant.

“All the time,” Aaron admitted when asked how often he gets stung. He recalled once lying inside a log to watch the bees with a flashlight. “It was super creepy and really cool at the same time. Then I got comfortable and laid on my veil, and they stung me in the face!”

Aaron also assembles “nucs” – a small nucleus colony for starter hives – and provides bee removals year-round, sometimes crawling into fallen logs or having to carefully remove a hive from inside a wall. Now that they work with national bee helplines, they receive even more calls from people across our state.

“One year I did 70-some calls, I travel all over Nevada for removals,” Aaron stated.

Over the years, the Grimes have not only produced pure honey but also launched a range of infused products and creative treats that keep customers coming back. Stacy shared how her experiments in the kitchen took off:

“It started for me with brownies, zucchini bread, banana bread...then I discovered jellies. I never made a jelly before in my life, and my first batch was raspberry—it was delicious.” From there, she expanded into jams, honey suckers, and an ever-growing list of infused honeys.

Their lineup is as inventive as it is tasty. From hibiscus and lavender to Madagascar vanilla and turmeric, a fiery habanero cinnamon blend to a garlic honey with chunks of actual garlic. And for spice lovers, Misbeehaven has ghost pepper, scorpion pepper and other spicy infusions great for pizza drizzle, marinades, and more. Plus, to get the flavor profile or color desired, infusions must sit for three, six, sometimes 12 months before they are ready.

Beyond the flavor, honey comes with a reputation for health benefits. Stacy, who
